A historical waterfront house on the island of Kastelorizo, converted into a sweet little hotel with charming rooms, a magnificent suite, arty touches and a slightly oriental flavour.

Parisian architect Marie Rivalant fell in love three times: first with the island itself, then with a man living there and finally with an old, waterfront house. So she moved to the island, married the man, and bought the house. Luckily for us, she decided to turn the house into a little hotel, and did so without trying to make an architectural or design statement. The house was charming enough as it was, and Marie wisely kept it that way, adding just colour, arty bathrooms and oriental details, all giving it a touch of the exotic. Bedrooms are spread over two floors, several light and airy ones facing the sea, and others that have a more oriental feel, with mattresses on a sleeping platform. A magnificent suite occupies the ground floor. Breakfast, a blend of Greek, French and Turkish delicacies, is served on the terrace, and during the day you can sunbathe in front of the house and dip into the clear waters.

What makes it special to me

I love the simple, unpretentious atmosphere of hotel Mediterraneo and the waterfront location is great; it basically feels like having an immense pool at your doorstep. You can swim across the bay to have a drink at the little bar (the hotspot on the island) right across.

But what you should keep in mind

Don't expect luxury. I was perfectly comfortable, but if you prefer luxury hotels you may find the comfort too basic. Minor detail: bathrooms don't have doors, but curtains for privacy. The sound insulation between the interconnecting rooms is not optimal.
